The Next Innovation Hub

MIT economists Jonathan Gruber and Simon Johnson put Rochester at the top of a list of 102 cities for its most potential to become the next American innovation hubs. The biggest factor: the colossal companies like Kodak and Bausch & Lomb that once dominated the city left behind a highly educated entrepreneurial class, which has now gone on to start companies. Thanks to billions in federal funding and an emotionally and rationally driven national push to reshore manufacturing after the pandemic—that potential may be turning into a reality in Upstate New York. The semiconductor sector, which is expected to grow to $1 trillion by 2023, advanced optics, and medical technology, are all growing industries in the region. Even Kodak is coming back, albeit quietly. With about 4,200 employees globally, it continues to serve the commercial photography market and is also using its printing expertise in innovations like applying light-filtering technology to curtains.

But the bigger story, in Rochester, is the companies that have grown out of Kodak's remains over the last decade. Mosaic Micro is one — Nelson worked at Kodak, so opening the startup office in the innovation center on the Kodak campus was in some sense a homecoming. Source: Innovation Magazine - Elizabeth McBride, June 16, 2023.
